

of finely divided material, into which, as it was moist, our animals sank, and partly of moss — this where the ground was firmer — and partly also of coarse gravel and even larger pieces of stone. On the other hand there was no hard rock visible anywhere, except in close proximity to the glaciers; but the condition of our animals was such that a visit up to them was not to be thought of.

---