

rocks, strewn about as if some Titan had broken them up for road mending, to a beautiful gorge covered with bush. The road then crosses the stream, and, much to the consternation of Pereira, there was then still another climb of 700 feet to the little plateau on which stands Nam-jé-garm, where he halted after a march of $20\frac{1}{2}$ miles.