

habitability of the arid regions began to increase; migrations came to an end; and Central Asia was prosperous for a time. Finally, a latest and slightest change took place in the other direction; and we seem to-day to be in the midst of an epoch of comparative equilibrium, with no marked tendency toward climatic change in either direction.