

companion was not unwilling to minister to the comfort of the other, but he was directed never to remain longer in the sick man's tent than was necessary. Dass, the cook, obtained milk and prepared soup for him, and poured these supplies into the sick man's cup at the boundary line beyond which no one was allowed to step except Changfunchuk. Usually I paid him a visit three or four times a day to observe his temperature, to ascertain his wants, and to administer medicine. No drugs which I gave him seemed to do any good, and my efforts to diagnose his case were fruitless. However, he began

A CASE OF ELEPHANTIASIS.