From a simple chamfered astragal spring two whorls of sharply serrated acanthus leaves. The lower, of four leaves meeting at their bases, rise half the height of capital and have their tops abruptly curved over on the line of its diagonal section, and so designed as to occupy fully the sq. section of the block. The second whorl has its leaves alternating with the first, and rising from between the rapidly diverging edges of these to top of capital. These also have the tips sharply recurved and hanging down, occupying the centres of sides of sq. contour. From behind them spring R. and L., upward and outward, curving volutes, meeting and curving downwards in pairs, at the upper angles of block; a row of diminishing seeds following the lower edge of horn of volute.
